

From Steve Sandler:

This is one of my memorable Roddy stories.

We were at the "Decatur Dump" sale as Roddy liked to refer it.

It was a good day for us that attended and bought items from the residence at this house.

After we, Roddy and myself, and others meandered through the house and bought a few items, we found ourselves in a smaller building out back.

It was more like a very worn out shack, no lights, weak wood floors, etc.

At that moment it was just Roddy and myself trying to be careful of how we maneuvered about the piles of "Stuff".

After going through mostly everything in site on top of the desks and workbenches, we both started to rummage through the items underneath.

Soon after we started that search, I found a box with an unopened older oscilloscope and frequency counter kit.

I showed it to Roddy and he was so happy for me as we went through it together.

Then, Roddy himself found a box of several unopened older assorted electronic kits and was extremely excited with his discovery.

We both examined through his discovery, that he shared with me, and just complemented each other about our finds together.

Many times since that adventure, Roddy always mentioned the "Decatur Dump" for discussion and remembrance.

This was one of those memorable "Moments in Time" for myself that stays with you and will not forget.

Roddy was always gracious and kind to me anytime we met, no matter the occasion.

I will always remember that about Roddy and the times we shared together.

God bless you Roddy Pearce.
